Announcement

During this quarterly issue of Victims’ Voice, we kick off October as Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Domestic Violence dynamics are particularly difficult to address within the corrections system. Of all crimes, the crime of domestic violence poses the highest risk for a fatality while an offender is under supervision.

Research indicates, even if the charge related to domestic violence is a misdemeanor, it is a high-risk indicator for recidivism. Supervising a batterer or managing behaviors while a batterer is incarcerated is difficult due to the manipulative behaviors that exist within the domestic violence dynamics.

We hope you’ll enjoy reading and learning about some of the great things the DOC is doing. We welcome any feedback, content requests and ideas for future topics. Please email CorVictimLiaison@mt.gov.

This quarter, Victim Services recognizes PO Caine Hilario for his exemplary work with victims.

“Victim Services is an underutilized program and I absolutely will seek assistance again when I encounter another victim situation with one of my offenders. Victim Liaisons are a great asset for P&P Officers.”

Home Base: Billings, MT

Why did you choose a career in corrections?: I felt this would be a challenging position. My goal is to help people by giving them guidance and to help them see they are not stuck in the system but can have a better life. I find it rewarding knowing I am helping others and their families do things differently and have a healthier lifestyle. I choose to listen to people and take what they say at face value. I believe in my clients unless they prove otherwise. I ask individuals on my caseload to be honest with me. Many of them find it difficult to trust authority but I work to gain their trust over time.

Nomination Quote: “Caine put in a lot of time and effort on this client’s behalf which showed he cares about the safety and success of clients on his caseload.”- Maria Dinkel

DOC Victim Services salutes Caine for going above and beyond to assist an offender/victim find the way to safety and healing.

Caine recently worked with a human trafficking survivor. He recognized signs in her behavior consistent with this crime. Caine reports his offender seemed filled with anxiety, reluctant to discuss her issues with him, held distrust of authority figures, did not want to cooperate, reported sexual assault, homelessness and always had a male friend in the lobby waiting for her.

Although it was difficult to gain this offender’s trust, Caine reassured her she was not in trouble and had done nothing wrong. Caine recalls introducing his offender to our Victim Liaison Maria Dinkel and thinks laughter and chocolate was able to reduce the hostility of the situation and begin a trusting relationship. Our victim liaison offered additional support beyond that of a PO, which was needed by this offender.

Caine and Maria worked with a local human trafficking agency to assist this offender relocate to a safe house program in another area. While this offender/victim has a long road of recovery ahead of her, she is safe and receiving much-needed services for healing.

Thank you, Caine!

PFMA Offender Caseloads:
Probation officers across the nation are discovering domestic violence cases present unique issues not common in other types of supervision caseloads. These include:

- Increased need for interactions with victims.
- Interaction with potential new victims
- Collaboration with batterer intervention programs, and,
- Understanding the unique dynamics of interpersonal relationship violence.

Cycle of Violence: A common thread in reports by victims who described a cycle of tension building, followed by an explosion or acute violence, followed by a “honeymoon” stage. As the cycle continues, the explosion stage escalated in severity of violence.

Since officers have more interactions with victims (or potential new victims if the offender is in a new relationship), it is important to know what stage the relationship is in when investigating potential violations of probation or new crimes of violence. Often when a new episode of violence occurs and the offender is arrested, it is not uncommon for the relationship to enter the honeymoon stage. Therefore, the victim may become reluctant to cooperate in future questioning or testifying in court.

Coercive Control: Series of behaviors that are not necessarily violent but result in the batterer controlling their intimate partner and children through a pattern of seemingly innocent behavior. This can cause fear and apprehension in victims. These behaviors include verbal and emotional abuse; isolation; denial and minimization of violence and the effects of injuries to the victim; threats of harm; economic abuse; using children for leverage; and more.

When supervising offenders who are still in a relationship with the victim, or even when they are separated, it is important to recognize the effect that the offender’s words or actions can have in terrorizing the victim, absent any new physical evidence.

Why Don’t They Leave?: There are many dynamics that are not evident to the average person that influence this decision. It is not uncommon for victims to accept blame for their batter’s behaviors. Some victims do not reach out to the probation officer until a major disagreement ensures. Victims may later recant their statements, minimizing impact and decline to participate in any disciplinary actions against the batterer.

If these situations occur, it is critical to document the behaviors of the victim and/or probationer in your case notes. It is important that probation officers do not blame victims for their decisions and refer the victim to an in-house advocate, or your local shelter program, for them to seek further counsel on their options.

The Montana Legal Services Association has launched a new website connecting crime victims with information and free legal assistance. This new website contains information to help crime victims and service providers find resources and navigate the justice system. It connects crime victims, family members, and service providers in Montana with legal help and supportive services.

On the website users can learn about victims’ rights, search a resource library, apply for legal assistance, chat online with a trained Crime Victim Navigator, or use a specially designed Help Tool to find what they need. The site was built with attention towards user safety, confidentiality, accessibility, and functionality for rural crime victims and service providers.

Talking to Offenders about Domestic Violence

Montana PFMA Crimes by P&P Region 2017-2019

Commonly Used Tactics by Offenders
Adapted from “Domestic Violence and Probation” by Fernando Mederos. These are some common tactics used by batterers to manipulate probation and parole officers. We hope you enjoy the refresher.

Batterers will try to “divide and conquer” by running a disinformation campaign. Batterer’s are experts at finding divisions between people and exploiting them. They tell different versions of the facts to different people. Make sure all staff are consistent about the rules. It is important to be in constant communication with the batterer’s program, the batterer’s victim, and the victim service provider.

Expect the batterer to continue denying their behavior and blame the victim. Most battering offenders take months, or longer, to admit their behavior. Instead, they spend much energy trying to enlist a Probation Officer as an ally.

Many batterers attempt to get Probation Officers to back off by being constantly angry and challenging. Many batterers come across as being justifiably angry. They tell you their partners are crazy. Faced with constant “righteous” anger, you may find yourself shifting the discussion to less volatile ground and listening out of polite sympathy. We encourage you to structure conversations carefully and to sharply limit complaints about victims.

Other offenders attempt to get Probation Officers to back off by being super placating. He wants to do everything possible to “clear up this misunderstanding”. He may even suggest he seek help with his partner. Remember, many abusers are reasonable and charming with everyone, except their victim.

Intimidating offenders will try to wear you down; super-placating offenders will try to enlist you as an ally; BOTH will try to get you to do as little monitoring as possible. When successful, this will give the offender room to pressure his partner, ease back into the house, convince her the court is not serious, etc. We recommend that decisions about intrusiveness and monitoring be based on risk level of possible future domestic violence and to engage a victim service provider.

Offenders may attempt to engage you in arguments about their culpability. It is recommended that Officers not engage in such arguments. If there are legitimate questions about the offender’s abusiveness, the batterer’s treatment facilitator and/or a victim service provider can assist.

Do not tell the batterer anything the victim has told you as it may place the victim in further danger. Speak to each party separately. Do not divulge anything that may endanger the victim. Even if the victim has given you permission to share the information provided, make your own assessment about safety.

State rules in an impersonable fashion; focus on options and consequences. Batterer’s often love arguments and dominance struggles. Don’t engage. You can say, “I won’t argue with you about your probation or being sent to treatment.” Clearly define the consequences for non-compliance.
